Western Region

Monday, February 6

- The storm system will exit the state Monday, with gusty winds and a few lingering showers possible through Monday morning
- A couple rounds of Santa Ana winds will be possible across southern California, first late Monday into Tuesday, and then again on Thursday into Friday
 - Wind gusts of 30-40 mph will be most common, locally up to 50 mph, with the strongest winds occurring through and below the mountain passes
- Most of the state will remain dry for through the work week
 - Light showers will be possible across far northern California Tuesday night and then again on Friday, with no significant impacts expected
 - Overnight and morning fog will be possible, especially in the Central Valley
- A storm system could bring a more widespread chance of precipitation over the weekend, but confidence in details and timing are currently low
